MICHAEL KABOTIE – 1942-2009

Michael Kabotie, Hopi, was an innovator in the Native American Fine Art Movement, creating paintings that reflect traditional Hopi life in contemporary media. Kabotie's paintings reflect his Hopi mentors, the pre-European Awatovi kiva mural painters and the Sikyatki pottery painters, with a contemporary interpretation.

While in high school, Kabotie was invited to spend the summer at the Southwest Indian Art Project at the University of Arizona with Fritz Scholder, Helen Hardin, Charles Loloma and Joe Herrera, who became a lifelong friend and his primary artistic mentor. Kabotie later said that the project had "planted a seed; that seed began to grow and then blossomed at later times in different ways."

In 1967 during his Hopi manhood initiation into the Wuwutsim Society, Kabotie was given his Hopi name, Lomawywesa (Walking in Harmony).

Kabotie, Terrence Talaswaima, Delbridge Honanie, Neal David and Milland Lomakema founded the Artists Hopid in 1973 as an exploration of Hopi culture and art, a collaboration that lasted five years. Kabotie's book of poetry, Migration Tears: poems about transitions, was published in 1987 by the University of California Press.

Kabotie was a featured artist in many of the Heard's exhibitions. In 1991, Kabotie participated in the conference that accompanied the Heard's exhibition Shared Visions: Native American Painters and Sculptors in the Twentieth Century. In 2006, Kabotie designed the front gate of the Berlin Gallery, the Heard Museum's contemporary American Indian art gallery.

Kabotie created a special painting that graces the cover of the Fair program as well as T-shirts and posters. During the Fair, Kabotie's life and work will be honored for his contribution to American Indian fine art.
